

When I go around the county talking to the public, people make it very clear to me that they want to see additional police officers out on patrol and working to protect our communities and for crimes to be investigated quickly and effectively when they are reported. Similarly, when I talk to police officers in Warwickshire, I hear of the increased workloads that they are all having to carry in order to meet the current rising levels of demand.

These are the two major factors which have influenced my decision to increase the police precept this year. No tax rise is ever going to be universally popular and I have listened carefully to the more than 2,600 responses received through my public consultation. The budget I am setting will allow for the recruitment of substantial numbers of police officers over the next 12-18 months, bolstered by extra police community support officers and crime investigators who can provide additional support and expertise where needed to bring criminals to justice.

This will take time to implement fully but I am confident we can build on the momentum of the current Warwickshire Police recruitment campaign, which is set to deliver by early summer in 2019 the additional 50 officers I funded in the 2018/19 precept.

Taken together, these increases will mean that over the next few years the numbers of police officer posts in Warwickshire will be heading back up to just under 1,000 and I am sure that is something that will be warmly welcomed by the public.
